First ever AllergyCertified raw material

It is with utmost pleasure that we can announce, that we have certified the first raw material.

The raw material is called Veggilanol Gold and is from LanEsters. A German based company that offers Lanolin for cosmetic products. The raw material has been assessed by our toxicologist Ewa Daniél. She says:

‘We deny certification of five to ten percent of the products we receive every year. This because we find impurities or preservatives in a raw material, which we can not allow in an AllergyCertified product. So with certification of raw materials it will become easier for every product developer who already works in the field of skin-friendly products or who is interested to start developing these kinds of products. The certification tells the developer - here is a raw material that has already been assessed, go ahead’.

When AllergyCertified was founded back in 2015 one of the goals was to certify raw materials. This is because we want to make it easy for product developers worldwide to develop skin-friendly cosmetics, make-up, diapers and other products that get in contact with our skin. Working with raw materials has taught us, that a raw material is not just a raw material. You will also find preservatives and impurities in the big barrels that are shipped worldwide for the production companies to use.

Ewa Daniél continues: ‘The amount of possible allergens in a raw material can be very small, but still big enough for people with skin allergy to have an allergic reaction. Therefore it is exciting for us to see that more raw material suppliers have already contacted us. My hope for 2019 is that we will be able to certify a long list of raw materials, thus making it easy for product developers to put together products that are truly skin-friendly’.
